

A simple nature council

Page 1 of 1

Methods and Guidance for the Practical Implementation of Ecodemocracy

Context: This resource is suitable for a broad range of applications. It is intended as a stand-alone activity.

Advance preparation

In advance of running your nature council, a chair should be appointed. Then, as a group, you should work together to draw up a list of stakeholders in the scenario for which you are aiming to reach a decision or make a plan of action. There should be just enough stakeholders so that every person (not counting the chair) can be assigned exactly one to represent as a proxy.

Each proxy should be given time to read up about their designated stakeholder, in order to determine what their interests may be pertaining to the scenario.

Possible stakeholders

Stakeholders could include a population of a bird species, the species itself as an entity, the soil, the living community within the soil, humans, a stream, or any other element within nature that is deemed to have interests relating to the scenario in question.

The nature council

During the nature council, the chair should oversee a discussion into which all parties (acting as proxies for the identified stakeholders) have a chance to input, based on the preparation they have undertaken to fulfil the role.

The ultimate goal of the council will be for the group, acting with the chair's assistance, to reach a decision or make a plan of action that seems fairest across the balance of interests for the identified stakeholders.

This resource is inspired by the Council of All Beings (see, for instance, Thinking Like a Mountain [New Society Publishers, 1988]): <https://archive.org/details/thinkinglikemoun0000unse>